

Beginning Was

Poems

by

Paul Kameen

Copyright 1980-2017 by Paul Kameen
Cover Image 2016 by Joseph Kameen

Acknowledgements: The South Carolina Review, Poet Lore, YASM

Preface

Language was born all at once. . . After a transformation . . . a change has taken place, from a stage where nothing had meaning to a stage where everything had.

C. Lévi-Strauss

I wrote these poems in 1979-80, over a period of about a year. I had been reading Derrida's Of Grammatology and decided to go back to look again at Claude Lévi-Strauss (the pre-post-structuralist, or just plain structuralist, anthropologist.) When I read the sentence above, I was overtaken by a sensation of what a cacophonous effect that would have had-- I mean if language came all at once, just like that. An empty, placid head, nothing much doing. Then, what? I had a vision that the whole of human history might well have been a series of failed attempts to come to terms with the profound trauma of this "transformation." I've never had much confidence in words. Odd, you might think, for someone who makes his living with them. But that is exactly what words do, make us odd, make us living. That's why I wrote these poems.

Hyperuttereme

Way back in the back of his wackiest dream, words woke, wafted up in him like smoke.
Meaning-mirages flickered, flared.
Hair to his feet, stutter in his step, he muttered down the mountain, re-nouned now.
An alien image shimmered at his feet:
he studied himself in a puddle of his fear.

Carefully surveying his semblance for structure, he spotted a specter lecturing a tree: "I am nothing and I run this show. So there!"
The tree did not reply, just stared vacantly past the horizon, frowning its brow, all the answers it had carefully prepared fleeing piecemeal in his wind.

Unaccustomed to the suddenness of sundown, a rush of pitch, he breathed deep to quell a quiver in his voice.
He pretended he was dumb.
But he was not. Moonrise.
Lightfall through the leaves.
Lithe shadows dancing around trees. He cleared his throat, composed himself: "I am nothing
and I run this show. So there!"
Chaos! He scratched his chin, wondered at the that mess he was in,
climbed a tree to find out what went wrong.
Peering down from the topmost branch he saw something ugly and inevitable lying beneath him on the ground beating up dust with dirty wings.
He waited for himself to descend.

Motes

There came weather fit for any king.
This is awfully sweet fruit to eat, he thought, gnawing as he walked.
He torched a bush and nothing was consumed. He caught a fish and fed himself for weeks. Rain came down like breadsticks at his feet.
He made a coat that sparkled in the sun.
He sharpened all his teeth.

He was the only player and made up all the prayers. He brought a boulder back and boxed it.
He was the apple of his eye.
Puffed up like wind, inscrutable as night, he swelled, spelled, yelled, mayhem in his wake.
This is heavenly he thought, the way it ought to be.

Huntsman and herdsman
he hounded sounds around.
Blameless, he changed the rules, rolled a bigger boulder back.
Then the weather changed.
Black clouds, stacked up sticks, sparked a few hard ones in his ears.
In the echo of the last blast, a whisper of a warning in the air:

"It's snake eyes this time, pal. See." Those words like stones were spoke and broke his teeth. Silver slivers pierced his tongue. His coat went up in smoke. In a squalor of solitude, he dug in deep.
From the dark hole of his head peering, he saw nothing but the tiny light of a distant bush burning in his eye.

Spume

He hid out long, sucked whites of eggs through straws, squeezed a boil on his butt, offered up a flock of explanations. Nothing worked.
Water lapped his ankles as he paced.
He slaked his throat to pray but the gall of it all caked his tongue in salt. This was a world for frogs, and he was not.

Caught in the crotch of a dilemma, stripped stark to his sole self, he lapped and babbled.
The wind-flogged waves lapped and babbled back, slapped disappointments down.
One minute lightning stroked from pillars of clouds. The next fist-size hail pelted him senseless.

Bellicose winds rolled over him like war, draping sheets of rain over corpses of his dreams.

He tried to sleep but tossed like froth on the swells of an ungovernable sea.

He swam until his arms and legs were jello, bellied up and waited for the end. He woke on bald rock, a dead bird at his feet.

No one read his rights.

His wrongs were booked and printed on two tablets in his hand.

He popped them in his mouth to stop the hammers whamming in his head.

He built a cell and polished all the bars, slammed the door and threw away the key.

He waited for a signal from the stars.

His heart beat like a kettle drum to be free.

Well-Done

Free at last from his checkered past he gird his loins up like a man, found a desert of his own.

This is sackcloth time he thought, time to tame the beast. He squatted in a hovel made of sticks, fasted down to bone, sat still as any stone, heard nothing but rusty music of dying wind among dry reeds.

His tongue stuck to his palate and was dumb. It was a long season down among the snakes. They grinned and writhed like women naked at his feet.
They told him dirty jokes.
They drank and smoked.
Temptation upon temptation came and went. Tough as any nut to crack, he just grinned back and bore it.

Then one day, honed hard, he came out flailing, stomped the snakes, pulled their teeth and scattered them like seeds.
Up they sprouted, longer, fatter, meaner, baring bigger fangs.
They coiled tight to strike.
He gird his loins up like a man, turned his tail and ran.

This is hair shirt time he thought,
time to salve the soul.
He squatted in a hovel made of stone, whipped himself in shape, made nothing but rusty music with his chains, to which he chanted in a stupor till he slept.
He was dark and stunning in that dream.
He gave himself the creeps.

Logos

Caught in the gauze of violet dawn he hung like haze between leaf and light.
The landscape was transmogrified, violent and weird. He was beaked and tweaked and spindled, poked and pulled and poled. Rosy fingers picked him up like dust, flicked him back to dreams. Schizophrenic clouds raced in and out, stage left:

a genial soliloquy, translucent and profound; stage right: a chorus of thunder inviolable as night.
An audience of one clapped with one hand in his ear. He felt a wine-dark breath breathing down his neck, heard the clack of hooved feet at his heels.
He headed for the hills.

He hid inside a cave and built a fire to keep warm. All night he watched shadows dancing on the wall. Full of leading questions to himself, he followed jerkily where they led. Correspondence baffled him at first, but he heard the wheels that make it work whirring quietly, high above him in the sky: what is not is true.

He pulled out memories like a skein, snipped them into pieces at his feet. He flew like dew between leaf and light and knew.

He heard the croak of frogs, the chirp of birds announcing dawn. He wafted down on the wings of dying flies to the silence of ideas behind his eyes.

Wholly Smoke

This is enough to use for now he mused.
Exhausted from late nights, confused he decided on vacation time: a cruise.
Wrong from the start. Wind hit hard, piped up wicked music from the rocks, licked and tickled him like tongues.
Bound and determined to stick it out, he sailed the straight and narrow till it split, faced both ways at once.

A conundrum fit for a king: should he run the rocks and risk a pounding headache? or skirt the drain he knew would suck him down the chute?
Out of his depth on this one, he weighed anchor. Then he weighed his words. He had to have a cause-- that was final. Godly mountains poked through gathered clouds.

A smoky voice stoked up, spoke.
Was it his own? He listened like a child.
It told how bold and heroic on his broad shoulders he held up the whole shebang, had fought hard against stiff odds to make it speakable and neat, his long labors straightening up the stalls, a word for every thing, everything penned in words.

He lolled for hours balanced on the mast, memorized the rhythm of the waves.
He was efficient in his work, thought it out and back and out again, polished his material till it shone.
Ready at last he assumed a formal air, lit his pipe and lectured like a pro.
The wind and waves shrank back.
The rocks dropped off to sleep. So did he.

Locus

Like all dreams this could never last.
He woke to a world rational as glass.
Predictable as clockwork he punched in, settled to the task: He tracked down planets in their paths, greased a brand-new axle for the stars, set right the flywheel of his mind, picked his brains, numbered all his bones. He made himself at home.

On his way to lunch he slipped on wet grass.
The attractive earth beckoned and he sat.
There ought to be a law, he muttered.
And there was. He inclined himself to the plain truth and thought: I think I am. He marveled at the leverage this gave, geared down for the long haul downhill, positive his differential would keep him steady on the curves.

His lexicon was eloquent and trim, a perfect execution of sentences he pronounced. He catalogued a wilderness of names, climbed a ladder halfway to the moon, tamed a troop of angels to stage a sideshow on a pin.
Weather was cool and sunny as a rose.
Lovely dreams of dreams slid by his eye. Nothing left to know.

Then thick fogs rolled up the shore.
Things began to rust. The grease so right for sunlight congealed at night.
There was friction in the works.
He felt the axle give. A time clock clanged.
He punched out with his fist. His flywheel grew eccentric and he shook. Insomnia set in. His nerves were shot. This is a crying shame, he cried. And cried.

Audit

His dreams were shards of tinted glass.
He fitted piece to piece, puzzling up a maze to trap sunset on the wall.
Too late. Coffin-lid dark slammed down, spindles of starlight, spikes of moonlight, midnight black and white. His memories flew south to bask and tan. He stayed, bleary-eyed by candle-light, keeping the books: a plague of red.

He tried to find a balance, spent knights, put dividends in the mail, taxed logic with deductions, took exemptions, sheltered yearnings, subtracted something from nothing, filled ledgers with loopholes, a melody of numbers.
Easy street, he thought.
Then his memories drove back, well-bronzed, revved-up, ripped.

His middle was distributed wide across his seat. They wheeled, dealed, peeled off wads of cash.
His assets were locked in stocks.
Losing interest fast, his currency devalued, came the crash of pale and feverish dawn. Unenlightened, he nodded down in lamp black, broke.

Unable to break the bank,
He armed himself with lenses and a trick. Finally in a fuzzy negative, he found the fudge-factor:
not in what he saw, but how he looked.
To resist temptations to convert ambiguity to fixity, avoid contradiction, he posited tolerance as a first principle, stopped copying, hobbled off to sleep.

Shadowbox

Today was another defeat. He took it hard, licked wounds, sat ringside to think.
Sick of playing weakling to the world, nursing nasty bruises between bouts, he vowed hard work, a rematch and revenge.
He rolled a boulder up and down a hill, pounded rocks to pebbles with his fists, skipped breakfast, lunch and rope until his muscles bulged and brimmed.

Square jaw set like concrete, eyes like fuming coals, he climbed into the ring to have it out. His thighs were cinderblock and brick; his back, coiled copper wound to springs; his stomach, anvils in his gut; his lungs, big bellows huffing up a storm of brimstone on his breath. He raised up arms like smokestacks and they smoked.

He electrified the crowd, which roiled, thundered, roared for something more.
He thrust an iron fist down the furnace of his throat, forged a new vocabulary of steel. It clanged: the fight was on, exhilarating, blood-curdling, obscene, a holocaust, a war to end all wars, as ugly a match as ever was and worse.
It was even after eight. He dished it out and took it on the chin. Air was thick as cyanide by ten. He panted like a dog.

Sweat oozed out like benzene by thirteen.
Thirst burned like tumors in his throat.
The final bell. His atomic arms were heavy and dead as lead. His stomach backfired.
The decision was split against him.
So was he. He limped back down the runway.
Only to find he had no place left to lie

Logoff

In wonder had he begun. Now in astoundment he stopped. Where to go from here?

Contemplation was fine for sleepless nights.

But this carbon-black dark tugged eyelids shut. Pale and somnambulent, perfectly dreamless, he set his probe for objective facts and probed. He tuned his headset, tracked them down—beep, beep—beneath his feet. He flipped a switch and shadowed them—blip, blip—across a screen. Soon he found them everywhere, a world pocked and scabrous with facts.

He honed a jargon sharp to lance them.

He cultured them in tubes.

Heuristics buzzed and swarmed like fruit flies. Algorithms multiplied like rats. A downpour of statistics, run-off at the mouth.

He was hypnotized by digital displays, mystified by miracles of gear.
Nifty bag of tricks! All night he plotted graph after graph predicting graceful and delicate dawn. Done.
The sun squealed out garish, hot and loud.
His heartbeat revved, sputtered to a stall. Haywire day raced down.
Dumbstruck he wondered:

had the mechanic or his method gone stark mad? In abstraction had he begun.
In perplexity now he stopped.
Potholes pocked the blacktop.
Power failed. An elaborate cast of shadows collapsed around his feet.
Nothing was revealed.
He sat in the shade of an apple tree.
He decided not to eat.

Alarming

At a certain angle of incidence, daylight amputated the tallest trees, pried up stumps and scattered them like teeth. He stood on a smooth stone, its message worn off and distributed insensibly in the sand. He watched his own footprints sink into the same sand and vanish. He conjured up a crowd of others something like himself.

On their way out of his future and into theirs, some swung briefcases, others brandished knives. After a few nights, a balance was established at the intersection of one group with the other. Like the buzz of a fly past his ear at night he heard his words passing through the passing thoughts of generations, digested and excreted, bland handfuls of damp sand, leavings of leashed dogs littering vacant lots with dotty notions.

He spit in the dirt and mixed it with a stick. With an hour's close attention, he carved a glyph.
He let it harden in the sun. Someday, he thought, a briefcase and a knife will dicker over what it's really worth.

The noise of his existence was ringing in his ears. His sleep could never last. On the fringe of his final dream (a parade of insects through his brain, fireworks and flags) a dim image fluttered like frayed and faded braid:
a man, himself, typing out the words that came and went without a sound, a grim smile glued to his face like a twig.

For Good

Stopped at last in his tracks by the train of his thoughts, his wits wafted off somewhere like steam. He wanted to station himself, stand straight as a rail, feel wild wind whine past while summer leaves held fast.
But they flew off, fell down further and faster than sound, curled up crisped, and rotted on the ground.

He took a long look at himself and shook.
He wanted out, went out on his knees and wept. Trees kept themselves intact through frost and the fall and he knelt there on the leaf-fall through the long nights and all and he knelt there through snowfall and snowmelt until time came to crawl down waist deep in leafmeal, chastened and afraid of all he had come to know by posing as himself. And then he too fell back hard on his luck and it burned black and blacker and blackest fueling all his doubts. Forests came and went, pressed up next to him, and he lay down with them, waited to be mined and trucked to breaker, cracked and picked and sorted, packed and sold, dark veins gone up in smoke to stem the cold.

His heritage was ashes on the floor, clinkers left behind to clog the grate, a landscape pocked and pitted, all a waste.
But one black thought escaped, lay down in loveliness and slept. Somewhere in the back of his wildest dream it poked up through bald rock, self-hewn, perfect, multifaceted, brilliant in the light, a blue-white beacon beckoning his kind.